HONGKONG, MAY 26TH, 1868.

No one can now complain of having insufficient data for the formation of an opinion in reference to the great fire brigade negotiations of last year. The difficulty, as Mr. KESWICK says, was evidently that old difficulty, "who shall be greatest?" If, as the Governor concisely puts the case, the volunteers wanted to command the General, it is not altogether surprising that it was found impossible to make arrangements for the formation of the brigade last year. However, we can hardly believe that the majority of the volunteers, or, rather, the majority of those persons who would be willing to become volunteers in the event of a brigade being formed under satisfactory conditions, would advance any absurd pretension of this kind. A consideration of the whole game at cross purposes, revealed by the debate in the Council on Friday, leads to the idea that a good deal of mischief would have been avoided if the representatives of the Insurance Offices had not assumed the authority, to which they had no claim, of speaking on behalf of the community. The report of their committee scarcely pretends to be more than a report that all attempts to form a volunteer brigade have broken down. If all persons willing to become members of a volunteer brigade, in the event of satisfactory arrangements being made, had assembled in the first instance, and appointed a committee to confer with the Government, it is difficult to believe that the attempt would have failed as it did, failing doubly, by leaving the Governor disgusted at the extravagant claims made on behalf of the volunteers and the public at large, under the impression that the noble enthusiasm of possible volunteers had been strangled with red tape. How the representatives of the Insurance Offices can venture to say now that they spoke on behalf of the community, is beyond our comprehension. They actually carried on their proceedings with closed doors, and refused to allow a public report of what took place, an arrangement which was illiberal in any case, but which renders the claim which is now made on behalf of that meeting something much worse.

It was commonly said at the time this matter was being talked of last year, "a little plain speaking may be useful now,"—that the Governor proposed to place Mr. RENNIE at the head of the brigade, while most of the people likely to become volunteers, wanted to have Mr. OLMSTED for their chief. Mr. RENNIE, if this story was true, was evidently an attempt to reconcile the difficult question of authority. He was clearly to have been a link between the volunteers and the Government. But volunteers must have a volunteer chief. So far we fully agree with the feeling which Mr. KESWICK expressed at the Council, and we certainly never heard anyone suggested who combined required qualifications, special experience, and interest in the contemplated undertaking in a remarkable degree as Mr. OLMSTED. If that gentleman was considered ineligible on the ground that he was not at the head of any mercantile establishment, the objection seems to us irrational. But neither he nor any one else whom the volunteers would have accepted could possibly have claimed to exercise any kind of authority over the police, or a fortiori the military. If any such claim was advanced, it must have been advanced without proper authority, by people who had no right to speak in the name of the possible volunteers.

The broad deduction from what has been revealed is, that considering the peculiarities of Hongkong, a Governmens brigade has a better chance of success than one under a volunteer organisation. The moment of a great fire would not be a favourable opportunity for a dispute concerning the limits of authority between a volunteer officer and an officer of the police or the garrison. Unless a volunteer fire brigade is imbued with a hearty sympathy, and even a certain respect, for the regular forces with which it will have to co-operate, it is likely to do more harm than good. The public service is one in which there is only one way of purchasing authority, namely, by submission to some other and higher authority. In any case the volunteer superintendent of a fire brigade who wants to be useful, as well as ornamental, must not begin by wanting to grasp the ornamental attributes of power, while remaining altogether irresponsible himself.

A mistake was made in the Gazette of Saturday, which proclaimed the new Stamp Ordinance for that day. By a Supplementary Gazette the error was corrected, and the Ordinance proclaimed for 1st July.

Her Majesty's Birthday.

Yesterday being the day appointed for the celebration of the Queen's birthday, the men-of-war and merchant vessels in the Harbour were gaily decked out with flags. A salute of twenty-one guns was also fired at 12 o'clock as arranged, but unfortunately the review of the troops, which it was intended should take place on the Parade-ground in the evening, was postponed in consequence of the rain, which fell very heavily from two o'clock until dark. About half-past four who bugle announced in the Murray Barracks that there would be no parade, nevertheless the Police in strong force were marched to the ground led by Mr. Deane and his assistants; for the purpose of keeping the ground. On arrival they found that their services would not be required, so a return to barracks was ordered.

The Legislative Council.

Present:

H.E. The GOVERNOR.
The CHIEF-JUSTICE.
The COLONIAL-SECRETARY.
The ACTING-ATTORNEY-GENERAL.
The AUDITOR-GENERAL.
The ACTING COLONIAL-TREASURER.
H. P. RYRIE.
Hon. W. KESWICK.
Hon. J. P. DUNCANSON.

The Council met, according to appointment, on Saturday, at 4 p.m.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The GOVERNOR said he would like the Auditor-General to repeat the explanation he had partly given before as to the nature of these estimates.

The AUDITOR-GENERAL explained that the colony was not spending the amount of the supplementary estimates in addition to the expenditure, which had been estimated for the year in the first instance. On the contrary the actual expenditure of the Government was under that amount. But the transfer of amounts from one item to another rendered the present vote necessary as a formality. Thus $36,000 had been voted under special agencies for a gunboat, but the scheme under which this estimate was made had broken down, and the present estimates were required to sanction the use which had been made of that money. The purchase of the John Adam for the police, and of the powder hulk.

The GOVERNOR observed that the expenditure on the powder hulk was unprecedented.

The CHIEF-JUSTICE asked whether the Government did not insure the powder magazine.

The GOVERNOR explained that the Government never insured its own property.

THE GAMBLING HOUSES.

Mr. KESWICK wished to know if he should be in order in asking His Excellency whether anything could be stated in reference to the money received under the gambling ordinance.

The GOVERNOR said that properly speaking notice ought to have been given of a such a question. It was rather a difficult one to answer. There was a great deal which might be said, and a great deal which it was important that the Council should know, but if he were to limit himself merely to correcting the inaccurate statements which had been made in connexion with the subject, all the time which they had at their disposal for legislation would be taken up. He was quite ready, however, (but only with the permission of the Council) as it would be a departure from the usual routine) to answer Mr. Keswick's question. There had been no change whatever in the aspect of this matter. Nothing had been settled as to that particular point since the subject was first discussed. The original problem still remained unsolved, namely, what to do with the money if it were thrown upon us by the abolition of the monopoly? If it should not be. He did not like the Council to know how consistent the policy of the Executive had been in this matter from the first. (He sent for a volume of Blue Books, and read some extracts from 1863 to 1866.) As far back as the 9th of May, 1867, he had said that if the Home Government could devise any simple method of relieving the police of the harrassing and demoralizing duties of suppressing secret gambling-houses he would be glad to try it. He was far from saying that he had exhausted all the means which it would be possible to imagine, because he had tried all which he could think of himself. He went on, he said, in this dispatch to express to the Secretary of State his own feeling with him in thinking that no other way remained, but that of enlisting the aid of Chinese on behalf of the objects which the Government had in view. In a letter of the 29th May, he had suggested that to expect the hearty co-operation of the Chinese, unless the amount charged for the licenses were sufficiently high to affect the profits of the licensees, would be to expect the impossible, either of omission or commission. He could not give therefore any precise data for the basis of licenses which we first would or was ostensible to accomplish the main purpose of such licenses. From that day to this (and there were some earlier dispatches on the subject which he had not at hand) there was the opinion on the Government on this subject had been precisely the same. He could not give Mr. Keswick a better answer than the one he had indicated in a speech of his addressed to the Council in August last, in which he said, "whatever addition comes to your means from this source, can only be viewed as the incidental, and unsought result of a policy to which the Government is reluctantly driven in pursuit of an object of great public importance, and one which is entirely distinct from the acquisition of revenue." Then he had gone on to allude in this same speech to the imputation of interested motives on the part of the Government which were easily made, but which were without logical force till it could be shown that the Government were justified in fixing their scale, and during nothing by expenses acknowledged wrong, and put down illegal nurseries of crime, or till it could be shown that the Government had a choice of any other experiment. If anyone could invent a method of limiting the gambling houses to accomplish this the licensees no doubt incurred considerable loss, but the government was happily able to make it worth their while, in consequence of the present arrangement by which the amount of the monthly fees payable by the Licensees rise or fall in proportion to their exertions to carry out the objects of Government. They had now engaged a superior class of men to watch the players. The difficulty had been in the first instance to fix the license fees at such an amount that they would not be the licensees profits worth having, it would render them seriously apprehensive of any additional fines which might be imposed by the Government. One difficulty however could not be got over, but that of conveyance before the present system was introduced, just as much as now. There were always private clubs to which the better class of gamblers resorted, and those really charged with large sums of money could go for the purpose of gambling. At some of these houses large sums were lost, far larger than which were ever staked in the licensed houses. Some people might ask how it was now, that there should be any illegal gambling-houses left. That had puzzled himself at first, but the explanation appeared to be that while at the licensed houses the bank charged a commission of 7 per cent., the illegal houses held out the inducement of only charging 3 per cent. He would certainly not encourage gambling by making the licenses reduce their commission; moreover, no articles of jewelry could be staked as any of the legal houses, except the common Chinese gold rings, which, indeed, were not taken in pledge but simply purchased for their weight as metal—the vendor staking money. Another reason why there were still some secret gambling houses was that a large class of persons, who were known to the police as notorious offenders, could not venture to frequent the licensed houses. In reference more immediately to Mr. Keswick's question, he must say still before the Council that some of the money received under the licenses could be considered available for public purposes. He would not deny that the sum of $36,000 was necessary as a formality. That $36,000 had been voted under special agencies for a gunboat, but the scheme under which this estimate was made had broken down, and the present estimates were required to sanction the use which had been made of that money. The purchase of the John Adam for the police, and of the powder hulk.

The GOVERNOR observed that the expenditure on the powder hulk was unprecedented.

The CHIEF-JUSTICE asked whether the Government did not insure the powder magazine.

The GOVERNOR explained that the Government never insured its own property.

are may next hear of Dr. Livingstone at Alexandria. Should he continue to make his way down the Nile, he will be the first man, as very few have, who has "not only crossed the Continent, but has passed through its whole length from the Cape of Good Hope to the mouth of the Nile." But Dr. Kirk added that the essential part of his work will have been done before he reaches the Nile," and if he were to return towards Zanzibar he would even then have earned the honour of "the greatest of all explorers," and the African traveller par excellence." The accounts now actually received from him will, however, long unexplored only a small portion indeed being unexplored only a small portion of the whole distance between the Mediterranean and the Cape. Africa may be roughly said to extend from 30 degrees above the Equator to 30 degrees below it, or 60 degrees of latitude in all. Speke, Grant, and other travellers have penetrated from the North to below the Equator, and Livingstone has now penetrated from the South to within less than five degrees of the Equator. According to the map, there may be two and a half or three degrees more to reach

The Empire of Russia.

(From the "Times.")

The Empire of Russia is just now passing through one of those revolutions of opinion which determine the progress of nations. We are not speaking this time of the foreign policy of the Monarchy. It is not a question of the "acquisition of Kars," or the advances of Russia in the East, or her designs upon Central Asia, or any other such demonstrations on the path of conquest. It is a home question exclusively, and one which, though it undoubtedly interests ourselves and other people of Europe, concerns the Russians most of all. Briefly, the controversy is between Free Trade and Protection. That conflict of views which, sooner or later, arises in every State, according to its enlightenment, has arisen in Russia. The most discerning statesmen of the Empire have long felt the necessity of revising its tariff, and except for a peculiar and unexpected opposition, their opinions would, in all probability, have before now prevailed. Most readers will be aware that the accession of the present Emperor to the Throne was signalised by the adoption of what, under the circumstances, may be termed a fairly liberal policy. The emancipation of the serfs was of itself enough to characterize the new era, but besides that great measure many other reforms were gradually introduced, by which the institutions of the country were more or less assimilated to those of Western Europe. In the train of these reforms innovations it is probable that Free Trade would have soon followed, when the rising spirit was suddenly checked by a singular burst of popular feeling.

The Crimean War had left Russia enfeebled but not disheartened, and it can be readily imagined that a struggle distinguished by so many acts of heroism had acted powerfully upon the patriotism of the nation. This spirit became plainly visible during the last abortive insurrection of the Poles. England and France, as will be remembered, ventured upon some mediation in the question; but the Russian Government replied to the overture by a manifesto claiming for the whole Empire an invincible determination to maintain its rights and its power. How this not unnatural ebullition of sentiment could be connected with the revision of the tariff it may perplex the reader to imagine, but such was the case. Patriotism, or "nationality," became a popular cry, and the spirit which had been evoked in behalf of imperial pretensions was transferred into a struggle for manufacturing monopolies. Moscow was a centre of industrial enterprise as well as of aristocratic opinion, and "nationality" in industrial as well as political institutions became a watchword of the old Muscovite party. The sticklers for the traditional policy of Russia were at the same time the protectors of Russian manufactures. Nobles and millowners joined together to keep Russia as she was. Russians were to be as they had always been—independent, self-supporting, free from foreign influence, and as loyalty to accomplish their own destinies in their own way. This curious identification of political and commercial traditions has actually enabled a comparatively small party to offer a successful resistance to Free Trade. A Commission which sate upon the question not long ago confined its suggestions of financial reform within very narrow limits, and it is now thought doubtful whether a new Commission may not undo some of the little which had been done. Russia for the Russians, and Russia for herself, are the cries which have prevailed against the interests of scarcely millions of consumers. The question is still alive, but we fear we cannot say that the prospect is bright.

It is singular that Russia and the United States—at the two opposite poles of political organization—should display so many points of resemblance in national policy. The old exclusive traditions of the Muscovite party are very like the principles professed by the "Know Nothings" in America just before the Civil War. As far as the spirit is genuine or unselfish, it proceeds upon the assumption that isolation, as far as it can be practised, is for the benefit of a nation. Of course, neither the Russians nor the Americans, in so far as they profess to be people with "destinies," can shut themselves up like the Japanese; but though they have no objection to growth, they wish to grow as they are, and without any recognition of the mutual dependence of nations. Worst do the Russians the justice to say that they repute no selfishness to themselves. They do not pretend to believe that we are the advocates of Free Trade principles solely because such principles subserve our commercial profit. They see that we prosper, and, so far as our example goes, they see that Free Trade is good; but they do not choose to have it for themselves, and this rejection, which exposes with a certain poetry a mistaken idea of nationality, is naturally enough, adopted by manufacturers who are simply desirous of escaping from the pressure of competition. Between them, these two classes are likely apparently to have their way.

We do not profess to feel any disturbing concern in the immediate issue of this controversy. The Russian Protectionists are right in supposing that our material interests will not be deeply affected by the pending decision. But it is for the advantage of all that a country like Russia should adopt the policy most beneficial not only to other countries, but to its own vast population. The principle of Free Trade is, not that any people should forego the pursuit of national wealth by works of industry, but that they should adopt those industries which nature recommends. We should like to see the exports no less than the imports of Russia increased; but there is no more reason, so far as nationality is concerned, why Russia should manufacture her own cotton stuffs than why she should make her own champagne. Those patriots would consist, not in forcing artificial, but in encouraging natural production. The Russians have special facilities for many industries, and if they would promote and develope them could well afford to leave other trades to other people. After the close of the Civil War in the United States a prominent American declared that the country could not be considered prosperous until South Carolina produced her own staffs as successfully as her own cotton, and he asked why the raw material should be transported all the way to England and back again, instead of being manufactured on the spot, as the very nature of things suggested. The answer to this was plain—that the "nature of things" told exactly the other way. Cotton was sent from Charleston to Lancashire for the work of the mill because that work was done as well in Lancashire that, after all the cost of transport, the manufactured article could be imported into America more cheaply than it could have been made there. The result proved that we enjoyed one gift and the Americans another, and that true "patriotism" consisted on both sides in an interchange of national advantages.

The Russians might apply the moral to their own case, but we may also add, in conclusion, that we have, in one respect, a kind of direct concern in the commercial policy which they may please to adopt. The revision of the Imperial tariff is very closely connected with the prosperity of the Imperial finances, and Russia is so frequently a borrower that her finances cannot be a subject of indifference to Europe. The higher Russia's credit stands, the better it is for Russian creditors as well as for Russia itself, and nothing would so tend to confirm this credit as a tariff more in accordance with the commercial principles now recognized in Western Europe. To this extent the question may be said to interest us, but that interest, the Russians may assure themselves, is second to the concern we feel in the adoption of a wise policy by so great and populous a nation.

A Tragedy.

A horrible tragedy is reported from the Isle of Man, where three children have been thrown into a well and killed by their father, who afterwards jumped in himself. There seems little doubt that the man was insane, and at the inquest a verdict that he had committed the act when of unsound mind was returned. He seems to have been in tolerably good circumstances, but had been for some days labouring under a groundless fear of the loss of employment. On the 3rd inst. he remained at home for the purpose of attending the funeral of a relative, and about half-past eleven that day he took three of his children down to see the corpse. Upon his return home he seemed greatly depressed, and his wife, because very much alarmed. She sent up to the fields for a man named Shimin, despatching Emily, her second child, with the message. After she had gone the husband went out to a well which stood opposite the door of his cottage, and began to play with the bucket and winch. This well was a draw well, some twenty feet in depth, and containing eight feet of water. He returned to the house and went out again, three of his children at the time playing in yard. His wife, who had taken the youngest child, an infant of three months old, out of the cradle, was in the house, when she suddenly heard one of the children cry out, "Oh, daddy!" Rushing out, still with the infant in her arms, the wife was horrified to find that her husband had thrown two of his children into the well, and was about throwing the third. She seized hold of him, but too late to arrest his purpose. He then turned to her, and said, "We are all to go together," and endeavored to take the infant out of her arms. A struggle ensued, but it was short. He took the child from her, and threw it into the well also. He then seized his wife, but she succeeded in getting away from him, and ran to a neighbouring house for protection. The child who had been sent for assistance now came up; and he threw her down the well and plunged in after her. The bodies were soon recovered, chiefly by the gallantry of the man Shimin, who descended into the well at the risk of his life. Only the child who was last thrown in survived; the other three, with their father were brought up dead. The ages of the deceased children were seven years, four years, and three months.

The Lancet asserts that the Mauritius will receive the whole of a very large sum in works of public drainage before it can be made habitable to Europeans, and calls for a commission of inquiry on the subject.
